Independent Inquiry into Child Sexual Abuse.

One month ago, after seven years of work – 2.5 million pieces of evidence and witness statements from over 10,000 survivors, the Independent Inquiry into Child Sexual Abuse published its final recommendations.

The testimony heard by the Inquiry has been shocking and sobering. The scale and the nature and scale of abuse in England and Wales "horrific and deeply disturbing" and said institutions too often prioritised their own interests. We are duty-bound to protect and institutions must be answerable for failing to do so. It concluded that "child protection must be given a much greater priority in public life."

The First Office of the Children's Commissioner for England (OCC) and NSPCC are in the early stages of a joint programme to support children and young people who have experienced abuse or neglect, and to support child protection professionals to better protect children.

– charities, law enforcement, frontline public sector organisations, health bodies and other organisations large and small – to inspire a national mission to prevent child abuse and neglect.

We are writing to underline our commitment to doing this and to call on you and your Government to bring in a national mission to end child abuse and neglect across our country.

We believe that the report must not end up on a shelf alongside other reports and reviews commissioned in the wake of tragedies.

Promulgating a code of practice will mean survivors courageously break their silence to expose trauma daily to ensure that we never have to have another inquiry like this. Victims and survivors deserve our gratitude for their bravery and determination. They must be at the heart of lasting, positive change now...

What has been agreed and included in the joint final report. We are now the custodians of this evidence and have a responsibility to act. As leaders, we have an agreement that our organisations

~~need political leadership from you and your Government to translate the Inquiry's findings~~

~~searching questions about what needs to change, it is now vital that the Government responds effectively. We understand that it will take time to work through the Inquiry's detailed recommendations.~~

~~There are however actions that can be taken straight away to demonstrate your Government is serious about implementing the findings from the Inquiry.~~

~~Firstly, vital to translating the recommendations in the final report into a robust system that truly keeps children safe.~~

~~You could, as recommended by the Inquiry, appoint a Cabinet-level Minister for Children.~~

~~Secondly, your Government can deliver Safety Bill – the Online Safety Bill – to Parliament as soon as possible.~~

~~Thirdly, the Inquiry's work and the Truth Project in particular has underlined that victims and survivors of child sexual abuse need a way to receive the help they need most. In the last year, the proposed Victims Bill, including delivery on the~~
